SOWK2100 Service-learning Online Course

Course Description

This online course aims to provide students with an overview of Service-Learning (S-L), including its definition, its relevant concepts and theories, and its implications for the good of society and enhancement of personal development. Through different online materials and interactive exercises, students can learn how to assess the needs of different communities, define objectives, design service projects creatively, implement the projects to meet these needs, and develop methods to evaluate the outcomes. Students will be encouraged to reflect on how the knowledge and skills that they have acquired in their own disciplines may facilitate the development of S-L projects. It is designed in the form of self-paced e-Learning modules which can be taken as a standalone prerequisite to students' self-initiated service projects.

Course Operation

The course will be open for enrolment in CUSIS every semester. Students who wish to take the course should enroll themselves into the course during the course registration period. After all course registration procedure complete, the course teacher will share the link of the online modules to students. Students should complete the course requirement on or before the designated deadline announced by the course teacher, which is usually before the centralised examination period. This course adopts pass-fail grading and the final grades will be announced in CUSIS on the University's official grade release date as announced by the Registration and Examinations Section.
